History

The Native American Indian Dog (NAID) is an ancient breed that has been a part of Native American culture for centuries. The NAID is believed to have originated from the wolves that inhabited North America thousands of years ago. Native Americans domesticated these wolves and used them for a variety of purposes, including hunting, companionship, and protection.

The NAID played an important role in the lives of Native Americans. They were used to hunt buffalo, deer, and other animals. They were also used to guard villages and families from attack. The NAID was a valuable member of the Native American community and was often treated as a member of the family.

In the 19th century, the NAID population began to decline due to the of European diseases and the loss of habitat. By the early 20th century, the NAID was on the verge of extinction. However, a group of dedicated individuals began to work to save the breed. In 1957, the United Kennel Club (UKC) recognized the NAID as a breed and established a breed standard.

Today, the NAID is still a relatively rare breed, but it is slowly gaining popularity. The NAID is a versatile breed that can make a great companion for a variety of families.

Appearance
